Provo River park proposal goes before commission

By JANET HART

PROVO — A new park along the western portion of the Provo River is awaiting final approval from Utah County Commissioners who got their first look at the proposal Monday morning.

The commissioners gave preliminary approval during their work session Monday for an agreement with Westgate Development, L.C., to develop Cottonwood Park as both a recreational facility and a holding area for emergency run-off.

The item will appear on Wednesday's regular agenda for final approval.

County engineer Clyde Naylor said the property, located approximately a mile and a half west of Geneva Road along the north side of the river, is part of the Provo-Jordan River Parkway. The county has intended to develop the area for public use but so far it remains in its natural state.

Under the proposed agreement, Westgate Development would pay the cost to develop the park and in return be allowed to use it as a flood holding area for emergency run-off water conditions from the nearby Harbor Park subdivision, Naylor said.

Development along the three-acre piece of land would include trimming and protecting existing trees; constructing berms at edges of the park to contain and store water; constructing a culvert between the park and river to carry surface water into the river; and grading the area for planting a lawn.

The developers will also be required to plant grass and provide two picnic tables. County personnel will be responsible for maintaining the park and drainage culvert after development.

The only access into the park will be through the bike trail along the Provo River, Naylor said. Not allowing car access should mean the park will be used mainly by bikers and hikers who use the trail.

In other action Monday, commissioners approved an agreement with ADT Security Systems to tie the county administration building's alarm system into the county dispatch instead of Provo city and approved the appointment of Bill Ferguson to fill a vacancy on the Utah County Planning Commission.

HEBER CITY — The final decision on annexing Wasatch County school property, southwest of the city's industrial park, was tabled by the Heber City Council during a public hearing recently, and three other property owners presented their first requests for annexation.

The so-called "Wasatch Coutny School District Annexation" covers 70 acres, half of which is private property. The annexation process has been stalled because of the city's policy requiring all water shares attached to annexed property to be turned over to the city for its water system. The main advantage of annexation is being able to receive city services, like police protection and municipal water.

The problem is the school board wants to turn over only the number of water shares needed to convert to culinary water to supply the schools that will be built on the ground, and keep enough irrigation shares to flood its ball fields and landscaping.

Dr. Henry Jolley, district superintendent, said using culinary water for outside watering is far more expensive than using irrigation water, and it would not be in the best more.

During a meeting March 1 between the council and school district representatives, the council passed a motion authorizing the city attorney Jim Smedley to draft a special agreement with the district before the annexation was put to a vote.

During the hearing, Mayor Scott Wright said the resolution the council was being asked to pass would have required the property owners to convey to the city however many shares needed to offset the amount of culinary water they would require. But the property owners would be allowed to keep enough water shares for flood irrigation until the city needs them for a sprinkling system it is planning to participate in with the rest of the Heber Valley.

Jolley said the school board was satisfied with the proposed amendment. But, Wright said the city still had some problems with some of the details, and asked the council to put off a vote for now.

annexation and referred them to the planning commission to be the formal annexation process. A public hearing will be held before the council votes on each application.

One of the petitioners for annexation is the LDS Church's H. Stake, which wants to annex acres, located at 600 South and East. The church plans to build a baseball diamond and pavilion and would like to use the city's culinary water.

Larry Brown and Kent Huffman are asking for annexation of 31 acres on U.S. Highway 40 south of the city. They told the council they are planning a development for log homes that would begin with a higher density of housing in most residential areas. Subsequent phases would be developed with four to six units per acre, or multiple housing, depending on how the market responds to the first phase. A commercial log structure, like a motel, would be built on a strip of land on the highway that is zoned for commercial use.
